Course Details

Programme Highlights

Fire resistance is one of the major fire safety attributes of a building. The building system, including building elements (e.g. slabs, walls, etc.), building components (e.g. doors, shutters, etc.) and components of building services systems, shall comply with relevant statutory requirements in fire resistance. In this training course, the fire test standards, practices of laboratory tests for building elements and components of building services systems will be presented. Traditional and modern fire resisting materials will be introduced. The procedures of statutory submission and requirements on certification will be discussed. Case studies will also be included in this training course to provide practical examples of different problems and common errors which may be encountered in different stages of building projects.
